PRESS RELEASE

GEN-I, Slovenia's largest energy supplier, has published its new electricity price list following the removal of price regulation

Customer care is the key driving force behind the GEN-I Group's operations in all energy supply segments. Following the reduction in the natural gas supply price for households and small businesses and the electricity price for small businesses last December, GEN-I is further reducing the regular prices for households from 1 March, which is the date on which price regulation is due to end.

Ljubljana, 14 February 2025 – In response to the significant rise in electricity prices on international energy markets, the Slovenian government imposed regulation on electricity prices for household customers from 1 September 2022 to 28 February 2025 (with several interim extensions of the scheme). This shielded customers from the impact of high monthly energy bills.

While wholesale electricity prices continue to be higher on international energy markets than those we were used to before the energy crisis and the introduction of price regulation, the active international management of energy procurement that GEN-I provides through its wide international energy market presence means that it is able to reduce electricity prices for household customers following the end of price regulation on 1 March 2025.

The changes will be visible for the first time in energy bills for March, which are issued in April. The price of electricity for household customers will be almost 30% lower than the previous regular price list as an average across all three tariffs. This means that GEN-I is continuing to pursue its mission, even after the removal of price regulation, of being a reliable and trustworthy supplier, and the country's number one for customer care.
